LITTLE DOT in WONDERFUL WORLD OF DOTS

Mr. Polka threw up his hands in a showing of despair, and the hopelessness in his voice dismayed his daughter, Dot, more than if he'd yelled at her in anger.

"...But WHY would you paint DOTS on my best luggage?"

"It was the only luggage I could find, Daddy!" Dot explained. "Besides, how many people have polka dots on their luggage?"

"Exactly my point! How many people have a daughter who paints dots on everything in sight?"

Dot's face fell, and she sobbed, "I... I just wanted people to notice you, Daddy! Besides, the dots aren't painted on—they're pasted on!"

Mr. Polka didn't soften one mite. "Just for that," he growled. "You'll have to get rid of your dot collection. Maybe that will stop you from pasting dots on everything!"

Obediently, Dot set forth with a big hatbox full of dots of all colors and sizes. She fought back her tears and tried to understand her father. "He just doesn't know what a help dots can be to people!" she told herself.

While Dot was walking aimlessly, trying to find somebody who'd give her dots a good home, her Mom was chiding her Dad. She'd heard him carrying on.

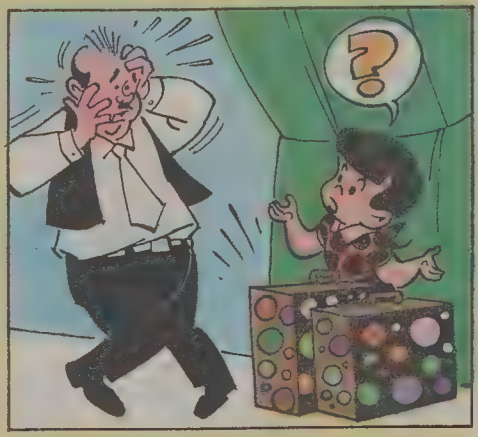
"You were too harsh with her," Mom said gently. "She's just a child."

"But how can I go out-of-town tomorrow with dots all over my suitcases?" Mr. Polka protested.

"Dot used her precious dots on your luggage because she cares for you so much!"

This touched Mr. Polka deeply, and a suspicion of a tear glittered on the lower rim of his eyes.

"Guess I was rough on her," Daddy cleared his throat as his voice broke a little. "I ought to do something nice for her. Yes, and I have an idea..."



Soon Dot reached town, and as she looked about for a dot lover she saw a good-looking young man and a very pretty young girl collide as she ran around a corner to catch a bus. The girl sat down from the force of the impact. She glared angrily at the flustered young fellow.

Before there could be any angry words, Dot took a handful of dots from her hatbox and tossed them towards the fellow and girl — and perhaps it was a lucky breeze that did it, but this actually happened—the dots landed around them in the shape of a large heart! Even more amazing was the effect it had on them. The girl smiled warmly as the young man helped her up.

"Gosh, you're beautiful!" he sighed.

"My, but you're handsome!" she exclaimed. And when he crooked his arm, she put her hand in it. They walked away together, chatting happily.

Dot smiled, her eyes twinkling as she observed, "Such is the power of dots!"

But her smile vanished as she remembered that Daddy had ordered her to get rid of the dots.

"I wouldn't mind if I got rid of them while helping people," she thought, "just as I helped that nice couple!"

So Dot went looking for people to help in order to avoid wasting valuable dots. And people did need help, too!

For instance, two cars were surely headed for a collision because somebody had carelessly knocked over a stop sign. Dot threw a handful of dots into the street in the path of one of the cars, and it stopped short just in time!

But the most exciting thing happened as Dot was passing a police station where officers were questioning a tough guy, Sluggo Snard. "I don't know from nothin'!" he yawned.

"You stuck up that little old groceryman!" Detective O'Flynn insisted. Dot heard this as she was entering the police station to see what she could do to help. Snard would never confess... unless her dots could help the police.

She approached the tough and tossed a handful of dots at his feet — and he looked at them, startled at first, for they landed and spelled out MAMA! Well, tough guy Snard broke down and blubbered, "Okay, f-fellers," he stammered between sobs, "I'm gonna confess for my Mama's s-sake! I done it!"

Dot was feeling pretty blue because dots seemed to do nothing for her except make her Daddy angry. She was walking slowly homeward, hoping Daddy would let her keep the dots after all.

"I love dots, even if they don't care for me!" she reflected sadly.

Dot finally reached her home and she went slowly up the walk and to the door. But as she entered there came a great surprise: Mom, Daddy, Lotta and a lot of other kids were there, waiting, smiling.

And best of all, there was a polka dot cake, polka dot table cloth — everything was polka-dotted. A polka dot surprise party!

"I guess the dots do love me," she smiled up at her Daddy.

WORK, WORK, WORK!

"Private Workhorse! Go through that maneuver course!" The sergeant was screaming at poor Wilson Workhorse.

"Yes, sir," was all Wilson could say. But under his breath, he muttered, "I don't think they'll ever run out of work for me."

"WE sure won't!" said the sergeant.

"Huh?" said Wilson, who couldn't even keep his thoughts to himself.

"Now over the wall!" blasted the sergeant. "Then over those barricades, through the barbed wire, climb the hill, go through the swamp, back over the wall — and report to me as clean as a whistle!"

"Yes, sir — gulp!" answered Private Wilson Workhorse.

And off he went, huffing and puffing his way over that terrible maneuver course, and wondering when his work would ever end.

When he was through, he dragged himself over to the sergeant, and muttered, "Mission accomplished, sir!"

"Good!" smiled the sergeant. "And you look wonderful, Private. I think you're just ready for garbage detail!"

"Garbage detail?" Wilson Workhorse gasped.

"Yes, garbage detail!" the sergeant rasped.

"Yes, sir," answered Wilson, as he pulled himself away.

"Then report back to me!" the sergeant shouted at him.

So poor Wilson Workhorse worked like a horse and suffered the smell of those horrible garbage cans. Afterwards — yes, he went back to the sergeant.

"My, my," said the sergeant. "Don't you look fit for action. And I've got just the action that's fit for you!"

"Yes, sir," puffed Wilson Workhorse, who was afraid of what was to come.

"You're going to do a little polishing, Workhorse," grinned the sergeant. "Not too much polishing. Just a little. First you'll do some silverware, then some floors, then some chromium, and then we've got a little equipment that needs a strong polishing touch like yours . . . NOW GET GOING!"

"Yes, sir," said Wilson Workhorse.

"And don't forget to report back to me," the sergeant's voice trailed after him.

Wilson Workhorse never knew how he did it, but he was able to get through with that "little polishing." He was lucky he saved the floors for last. He wasn't able to stand up when he got to them!

And when he finally reported back to the sergeant, he heard something he never thought could happen.

"OK, Workhorse," said the sergeant. "You can get some rest now!"

"Yes, sir!" beamed Wilson Workhorse, and he took off for his bed. He was enjoying the peace, the greatness, the blessing of quiet when he suddenly heard something. First, it was low. But then it became louder and louder, and he knew what it was . . .

"It's 'Reveille'!" shouted poor Wilson Workhorse as he lifted himself from his bed.

It had all been a nightmare—and what was now waiting for Private Wilson Workhorse was . . . WORK!

A LOVE STORY

Peter fell in love with Pauline the very first time he saw her. She was the most beautiful girl pigeon in the whole wide world, he thought. Her feathers were the pearliest shade of gray, and her dainty head and neck were the color of crushed rose petals.

Not that Peter was such a bad-looking pigeon himself. His body was also gray — a deeper, darker gray than Pauline's — and his neck and head were a bright, manly shade of blue. Together, he and Pauline made a stunning couple, and everyone who knew them was quick to tell them so.

So one starlit evening, summoning up all his courage, Peter proposed. "I'm not like some of the other birds we know," he told Pauline in a whisper. "I don't want a different wife every year! I'll love only you all the rest of our lives! Will you marry me, Pauline?"

"Oh, Peter, yes!" sobbed Pauline happily. "I love you too! You've made me the happiest pigeon in the world!"

And so they were married. It was a beautiful wedding, everybody said. The bride so lovely, the groom so proud — oh, yes, a beautiful wedding indeed. All smiles, the newlyweds flew off for their honeymoon, the oh-s and ah-s of the wedding guests still ringing in their ears.

Upon their return, like all young married couples, they faced the problem of a home. "Of course we'll build our own," Peter said masterfully.

"Of course, dear," agreed Pauline, like the good wife she was.

They worked together, and in no time at all their nest was finished. It was only a small mat made of grass and straw and twigs, but to Peter and Pauline it was the loveliest place they'd ever called home.

Shortly after they'd moved in, Pauline laid her first egg. Then two days afterward, she laid another one. What excitement there was then! The young couple were about to become parents!

They took turns sitting on the eggs to keep them warm and dry. Peter usually sat on them from breakfast time till dinner time. Then Pauline would take over till the next morning. While Peter was guarding the eggs, Pauline would fly around to do her marketing. But when it was Pauline's turn to do the guarding, Peter usually kept her company. Together, they'd chatter away, making excited plans for their children's futures.

Finally, on the 18th day, they heard a funny little pecking noise inside the eggs. And in no time at all the two tiny pigeons had pecked their way out of their shells. How little and cute and cuddly they were! Swiftly, Pauline swooped one of her babies up into her arms and held him close while Peter cuddled the other. And they smiled at each other blissfully. For they were a REAL family now!
